

[Start] [07:52.013] media and violence have even been put in a relationship though sometimes there is no significant way to prove it. Most parents who care about their children will not expose them to too much tv and especially not to violent tv shows. but nevertheless when kids grow older they find access either through friends whose parents do not control them as much or through other sources, increasingly the internet. many young boys, having the higher testosterone level, have been seen as problematic children anyways, just because our educational system is mostly ruled by women. they of course represent the female specifics and the female points of view. many female teachers think that boys are more aggressive, concentrate worse and do not do as good in school as girls do. they are perceived as impulsive, aggressive and sometimes even less intelligent. but why? it might be the case that education is more oriented on the female view and the female development, as many teachers do not think of boys as their primary audience or because they think that a shy, quiet and polite female student is a "better" student or more intelligent. violence in children and teenagers might be because of many factors that one can not determine the one that "give the" ausschuldung if a perfectly happy child in a safe environment, happy at school and with a good relationship to the parents who care does watch media violence once he or she will not be very likely to go out and be violent towards other people/children

Scap goat -

ing the Media With a growing number of violent acts committed by teenagers or young adults (for example in school massacres like Winnenden or several American high schools), our society has to raise and discuss the question of the reasons and why we why. Looking at the average tv program me and the video games most even pre-teenagers use daily, we can see that a lot of this stuff is not suitable for children or teenagers. Even a lot of adults would feel uncomfortable, being confronted with scenes and pictures that contain a lot of violence, blood and hate messages. Now the question is: Does this games and films make our children crazy? Do they transform our little ones into little terrorists and murderers? New L Let's take a close look at the way this discussion is handled: Politics Politicians who see themselves confronted with the question of how to come up with a solution (law-wise) which does calm the parents and teachers but does not stress the on in terms of being cut of from their free rights). Left politic Parents who are scared that something could make their child an aggressive [17.819] amokläufer or b) being killed by one. They feel like they cannot control all and everything media-wise, which at what their children consume media-wise. Which is right and true and has always been that way. But with the internet as a new easy source that almost guarantees access to any kind of forbidden and banned stuff, they are in a worse position than in their parents where with back then. The next group involved are the young people themselves; growing up in a (presuming you live in a first world country) with all varieties of media and access to almost everything they c an imagine via the internet. , they do not want to be restricted in any of their free rights to choose their entertainment. Because they are a) not used to b) and b) feel a lot of peer pressure to u put up with their peer group. All in all Every single group involved feels scared and thinks the other groups is potentially dangerous to their own goal. In this conteyt xt, it is no wonder all the rea search done up to this pio oint, is very diverse. V Every single study is different, focuses on different aspects and a lot of them do not want plain research but proof for their theorie. , which makes in t not to really eaas sy to do an o bjective jobn , . So everybody y how taking part in the debate can choose a stuy dy to support their theorie y and s s underline their point of b vi ew. . If So, if we cannot rely on the academics and scientiest ist to tell us, what to do? Common Sense se. S Common Sen se sense te tells me , for example when readint g that [14.356] exposure to a lot of media violence makes kids more aggreo x se ssive, that this is not a surprise. Not only because of the content. , IO think. A child who spends most of its time in fro nt of a tv - or computer screen OF COURSE n, alone w and socia oll ially [11.148] isolated and in addition with little attention w from the parents 's 's side, w ill of course fell el more aggressive, more depressive and less confide nt and a saf tie sfied then a an a kid in the p oop oposit e situation. What is ment to be said y by this argument: Yes, of cours e media violence a a has an influence, yes we should take care that our childre watch oiu r

p]