

[Start] [48.961] When she starts approaching the desk to sit in front of me to start writing, [11.139] she usually has a cup of coffee in her right hand. She looks as if she has some ideas in her head but is not really ready to start right away. [17.320] Most of the time, she opens the document she is working on, reads what she has written so far and sometimes changes words or sentences. Then she mostly opens the internet explorer to check her emails and look at the recent news. Sometimes she opens skype to see if some of her friends are online. When she finds someone to talk to, she spends a couple of minutes to chat and then starts working on her document again. Occasionally, when she is not ready to start writing again, she goes on youtube to listen to some music. Usually [After half an hour with or without writing] she usually gets up to refill her coffee. [58.532] When she finally decides to write again, she opens the texts she has saved on [for her references again, so she can go back to [12.792] and review her arguments. She writes a couple of sentences, re-reads them [11.603] and continues typing. When she has started writing she [she usually goes on for at least an hour before she takes the next break. This can go on for 4 four, maybe five our hours until she leaves me [12.397] on the desk to get a change of scene. Then I usually don't see her until some hours later or even the next day. normally. [eventually] scenario [11.443] [44.987] [45.499] [16.902] Very rarely, [10.372] she comes to write really early in the morning. Then she sits at the desk nearly

all day. Th and writes all day, I thin k this happens when she is almost finished with har er text and hasn't got so much time left before she ought to hand it in. Then she finishes the last paragraphs and statr reding the text many times. It is exa usi ting for me but most of the times she k looks very pleased with both of us at the end of such a d ay. [h] those times are [St op]