Other factors important: education level, family attitude, character traits, raising of parents (control of media consumption) censorship is not. Does not seem to be that important, as for example in Japan, people are not as aggressive as assumed. Japan has the highest most violent TV program (see study by Freedman). My opinion: easy to blame media as further problems connected with amok shooting (schools, teacher-student relationship, social lack of social pedagogy) would cost much materialalog of money and the political will to change the system. education al system. Essay: Would keeping children and young people from those influences, e.g. via censorship, be a good method of protecting society or would it be too big a violation of freedom of the press/the media? Whenever media reports on an amok shooting, in school, universities or other public buildings, a debate about violence in the media is stirred. It is often said that violence in TV and on TV and in computer games makes young people behave aggressively and decreases their changes people's attitude toward violence. In short, media violence is said to be an important cause for young people to [1] factor influencing the amok shooters [2] attitude in such a way, that he actually acts as he has just seen on the screen before. [3] However, as it will be pointed out, the problem of amok shooting is a very complex one and cannot [4] not just be drawn [5] [15.302] reduced to media exposure to media violence [6] . Various other factors also contribute to [7] decision of young [8] young people to kill other [9] and mostly themselves. [10] also [11] Thus, the [12] [12.605] The question whether [13] media censorship [14] seems necessary and [15] reasonable [16] is [17] thus [18] therefore is a controversial one [19] . [20] As some studies suggest, [21] , for example [22] by [23] [10.868] Huesmann [24] , "exposure to media violence causes children to behave more aggressively and affects them as [25] as [26] adults later" [27] . [28] Further, the idea that children learn [29] specific skills by imitating adults and people [30] surrounding them [31] , is a [32] [33] has also [34] ways been [35] an undeniable fact [36] that [37] , every observer or participant [38] can [39] see in young children. [40] Thus, it might [41] seems to [42] be [43] reasonable to [44] suspect that children being exposed to violence on the screen [45] will act [46] more aggressively than others. [47] [14.487] [48] Also [49] It is also [50] said [51] argued that [52] children [53] built up [54] mental [55] scripts and [56] [57] [58] strategies of [59] [60] problem solving [61] [62] [63] in their early [64] years. These might be negatively [65] affected when [66] children experience [67] [68] problems [69]

 As a Norwegian study points out, real life violence, for example by parents or, in the wider family or peer group plus violence on TV creates an "overload" of violence and the boys in this study consequently saw violent behaviour as part of their identity as males. Based on these various facts, media censorship as a single conclusion drawn from a modk shooting does not seem to make sense. It is as long as media influence on violent behaviour cannot clearly be identified, it seems only the easiest solutions to portray the individual copes with. shooter actually Factors like school atmosphere, teacher-student and student-student relationship, or the drastic lack of social pedagogues or a parents ability to raise a child have also to be taken into account.
